Washington State's Child Support Program

How do I get parenting time and visitation?

Transforming lives

DSHS 22-1133(X) (Rev. 12/16)

Transforming lives

Can the Division of Child Support (DCS) help me with visitation and custody problems?

No. Washington state law (Revised Code of Washington 74.20.040), does not give DCS legal authority to work with parents on custody or visitation concerns.

If you are not allowed to see your children because of a no-contact order or domestic violence order, you should contact an attorney to see if you can change the order.

What is a parenting plan?

When you and the other parent are not living together, you can make a plan that explains how you will parent your children. A parenting plan is a legal document (called a court order) that sets out the times that the child(ren) will reside (live) with each parent. If the parents do not agree, a judge decides.

The plan addresses the issues parents think are important in the children's upbringing. It also says where the children will reside and how the parents will share time with their children.

How can I get a parenting plan?

Parents often file parenting plans in court when they file for divorce. Unmarried parents can also file a parenting plan in court. Contact an attorney, Family Law Court Facilitator, mediation services or a community legal clinic for help with this process.

Facilitators are located in county clerk offices. A facilitator provides forms and information, usually for a fee about the "pro se" process but cannot give you legal advice. Taking "pro se" court action means "you do it yourself."

For more information, call DCS, your local courthouse or go to the courts web site at <http://www.courts.wa.gov>. Select court directory. Then select courthouse facilitator.

What if I have a parenting plan and the other parent does not let me see my children?

If you have a parenting plan but the other parent is not honoring the terms of the plan, you can contact an attorney or Family Law Court Facilitator to take the other parent to court for contempt.

How else can I get help?

Dispute resolution through mediation is helpful, but may not work for everyone. Dispute resolution:

- Is voluntary for both parents. No one is forced to use mediation services.
- Is a place you can go to and talk about problems.
- Helps you discuss and resolve problems with a trained, neutral person.
- Helps you understand each other's point of view.
- Isn't appropriate when there are family violence issues.

How can I contact someone to help me set up mediation?

Some Dispute Resolution Centers (DRCs) often charge a fee and some do not offer family mediation services. Not all DRCs offer family services. For more information, call 800-280-4770 or the DRC nearest you. The Resolution Washington website also has helpful information at <http://www.resolutionwa.org>.
